 "No single culture is hermetically sealed off from others. There can be no neat and tidy pluralistic separation of racial groups in this country. It is time to dispute with those positions which, when taken to their conclusions, say 'there is no possibility of shared history and no human empathy'. We must beware of the use of ethnicity to wrap a spurious cloak of legitimacy around the speaker who invokes it. Culture, even the culture which defines the groups we know as races, is never fixed, finished or final."

- "Gilroy is wrestling with a huge range of complex ideas, and putting forward an innovative set of claims. Many writers in cultural studies adopt an obscure style; the murkiness is a passport to professional advancement, or an attempt to mask an inability to write and think coherently. Between Camps exhibits none of that willful opacity. It repays the effort demanded."
